

Plan your Hike

Hiking into Grand Canyon—how far should you go?

- Have fun
- Be careful
- Seek advice

Use the charts below to plan a safe hike below the canyon rims. Remember that every exhilarating step you take downhill means twice as much work to hike back up. If you are not accustomed to the "red zone" elevations shown in the charts below, it is for experienced hikers only. Hiking to the river and back in one day is not recommended due to long distance, extreme temperature changes, and an approximately 5,000-foot (1,500-meter) elevation change each way. If you think you have the physical fitness to attempt this extremely strenuous hike, please seek advice from a park ranger at the Backcountry Information Center.
